Silvia Federici Search for more papers by this author. State enterprises were central to the administration of social benefits and controls, and even more so in China than Russia because Chinese enterprises formed their own pools for pension and other funds. Both countries have found it difficult to put the in-kind benefits onto a fully market-based footing, in part because monopoly providers are able to keep prices high and services poor, and in part because cash incomes remain low.

During the Mao era, attempts to derive legitimacy focused primarily on mass support. Further, in the aftermath of the Asian Financial Crises in the late 1990s, Chinese authorities became... Pages: 1- Wang, H.
