As he goes out to hunt the boar, he really does reject—though his phrase may be understood differently—a love he aptly calls a "life in death" Nevertheless, it is principally after Adonis announces his intention to hunt the boar that the narrator begins to shift his and the reader's sympathies markedly toward Venus. Tobin easily admits he was fay when they were young, and with that, admitting also that he was in love with Lyon.

By now literalizing her own metaphor Venus inverts its significance. Open Preview See a Problem? This, surely, is a recognition that the metamorphosis must be ultimately meaningless. With simple but somewhat unorthodox faith she provided comfort to both the wardens and families in distress.

I do think the Biblical connection is interesting but even that just went all
